2022	Joseph Levenson Prize (pre-1900 category) awarded by the Association for Asian Studies for The Chinese Dreamscape, 300 BCE – 800 CE (The award is for “the English-language books that make the greatest contribution to increasing understanding of the history, culture, or society ... of China,” with special consideration for books which “through comparative insights or groundbreaking research promote the relevance of scholarship on China to the wider world of intellectual discourse.” From the award citation: “ The Chinese Dreamscape is a brilliant and deeply empathetic study of how people in China thought about dreams. Besides bringing a wide array of texts into conversation with studies of dreams across the globe, Campany also invites us to turn the lens back on ourselves. As we try to understand these materials, what are our own ideas about dreaming? Campany draws on his deep knowledge of the sources as well as his profoundly humanistic approach to the study of Chinese culture and religions. It is an exemplary piece of scholarship and a beautifully written book.”)

CURRENT & PLANNED RESEARCH

I am currently working on a complete, annotated translation (with critical edition of Chinese text) of Traditions of Noted Transcendents or Liexian zhuan 列仙傳, likely to be completed by May 2024. Separately I plan to publish a lengthy article or small monograph on what this text tells us about the quest for transcendence (or the search for “immortality”) in China ca. 200 BCE – 200 CE.

Ecologies of Selves in Early Medieval China (working title). Inspired and informed by the anthropology of life (Eduardo Kohn), posthumanities (Donna Haraway), and biosemiotics (Jesper Hoffmeyer, Lynn Margulis), this will be an aspectual study of the complex, variegated relationships among human and other types of selves in the imaginaire depicted in and through the archive of extant texts. Will deal with tales about interactions with animals and plants; theories of transformation across taxonomic kinds; demonic and human self-cultivation texts looked at as parallel phenomena (e.g. spirit-foxes utilizing sex as a mode of self-cultivation and lifespan-prolongation just as some humans were doing); tales about spectral/human and divine/human relationships.

Buddhist Imagination in Early Medieval China (working title). A monograph on important aspects of the exuberant Buddhist imaginaire in early medieval China—aspects often overlooked in the wake of the “Buddhist modernisms” or “Protestant Buddhisms” constructed both in the West and in Asia that see Buddhism as primarily a “philosophy” or as “spiritual” but not “religious.” Chapter topics will include the sorts of stories told of icons; spirit-monks; spirits of goodness (protective spirits said to be activated by good deeds); protective bodhisattvas; mysterious fragrance as a sign of the miraculous; sutras as agents; relics and stupas; wonder-working monks and nuns; journeys outward and back (including near-death trips to the underworld and to Pure Lands); dreams and visions; recollections of former rebirths.

The Sword Scripture: Recovering and interpreting a lost Shangqing Daoist method for cheating death. The first translation and integral study of a fourth-century Shangqing Daoist scripture prescribing a method for escaping death. The scripture has long been lost, but substantial bits are preserved in quotations. The scripture turns out to be rather surprising, requiring a revision of what we thought we knew about Shangqing Daoism.
